The American Association of Petroleum Geologists has announced the following event:

Title: Hydrogen 2022: Virtual Technical Symposium - Exploring the Potential of Hydrogen Energy in Latin America and the Caribbean

Date of event: Dec. 1-2, 2022

Overview from the organization:

Environmental risks posed by climate change create an urgent need to accelerate the pace at which the energy transition is taking place. Geoscientists and engineers working in today's energy industry no longer look at the subsurface exclusively as a place to extract conventional resources like oil and gas, but also as a permanent sink for carbon dioxide emissions. In addition, through H2 storage, the subsurface becomes a "super battery" that can help to mitigate the intermittency of renewable energy sources.

Resource availability, access to technology, local conditions, public policies, and political considerations all determine the pace at which the emerging hydrogen economy will develop in the Latin American and Caribbean Region.

This AAPG Virtual Technical Symposium convenes geoscience professionals, engineers, economists and entrepreneurs from the energy industry, academia, and the investment sector to share ideas, best practices, and lessons learned to help the Region face the challenges associated with developing a hydrogen economy.
