Geology is changing, but have colleges and universities caught up with that change? Of course, the search for resources hasn't ended either. Some of the largest companies on the globe today are ones built on resource extraction: ExxonMobil, BP, BHP, Newmont, Chevron and more.

In total, they are industrialized, swimming in cheap energy and technologically advanced Changing Resources Yet, even today, we need these resources — and we need people to find new sources of oil, copper, gold, aluminum, rare-earth elements and more. This is now balanced with the dire necessity to change what resources we use. Hydrocarbons like petroleum, coal and natural gas what resources we use. Hydrocarbons like petroleum, coal and natural gas will have to be phased out as much as possible in order to stop the hurtling subway of climate change. Those lucrative jobs in the oil industry that have sustained many geology programs at colleges and universities are going away.

The . For many geology students, the idea of a very lucrative and (somewhat) stable career in the oil industry had significant appeal. In how many industries can undergraduate and masters students realistically get hired at starting wages close to or over $100,000 per year? You can see the appeal when you are 23 trying to make your way in the world.
